Note Fireworks is not currently in development but plans are underway to bring it back as part of the Creative Suite. As with many image editors, Fireworks allows you to incorporate text in your artwork, but it is also a powerful tool for creating and modifying images. The most common use of Fireworks is for laying out graphic elements on a page and for web design. In earlier versions, Fireworks also had some image-editing features. These, however, have been replaced by a more robust set of vector-editing tools that extend far beyond their predecessors.

The Autumn Statement: a brief review In the Autumn Statement, it was announced the government's main aim was to provide 'a low-tax, low-regulation economy'. This contrasts with the government's main announcements at the Budget, when the main aim was to raise taxes on low-paid workers and large companies. This is due to the fact that the Autumn Statement is before Parliament on the 2nd of November, while the Budget is on the 24th of November. This issue is the ideal opportunity to ask the question, "Is it really better to have 'high' taxes on low-paid workers, large companies, and property speculators, and 'low' taxes on everyone else?" In the Autumn Statement, the government explain that they want the 'low-tax' option, therefore, this is the reason the cost of living has increased more than in previous years. What is the reasoning behind the decision to let the cost of living increase more than in previous years? Is it because the government are trying to make their case to the general public that high taxes will only encourage people to work for themselves, and as a result of this everyone will be better off? Despite the government's claim, we can tell that this is not the case because the amount of money the government received from tax increases is decreasing every year. For example, the value of the pound has decreased in value against the euro, which is worth a lot of money for the government. In 2012, the government received £6.3 billion from VAT alone, but in 2013 this amount was only £4.7 billion. This is a decrease of £1.6 billion. This

Q: Is a computed property in Angular2 more efficient than using a boolean? I'm using the `ngOnChanges` hook to detect changes to a boolean property. `onChanges(changes: any) { if (this.isLoading) return; this.isLoading = true; if (changes.isLoading) this.isLoading = false; ... }` I'm curious if there would be any perf differences (and, if so, why) if instead of doing `if (this.isLoading) return; this.isLoading = true;` were replaced with `this.isLoading = true;` I've written a plunker (to attempt a rough comparison using microbenchmarks. There is no noticeable difference in performance between the two alternatives. Is there a technical reason (i.e. correctness concerns) why the former would be preferable? A: I wrote a small test: with/without loading state with/without `isLoading` property In chrome both are the same (approx. 20ms to execute the code), in firefox it takes like 20ms to evaluate initial code and some ~500ms to execute the code, with initial load. All test was executed without any data transmission and response. So if possible prefer to do it in the way that it does not require additional property, and the performance is good. The article: Pros and Cons of Adding Computed Properties in Angular Angular forum, an excellent resource to check patterns and existing techniques in current framework. Q: I want to use my Azure Active Directory credentials to access my Office 365 account I work in a company that has a segregated organization called "beta". We sign up for O365 beta, which comes with our company email address. I want to access our organization accounts, which are in our Office 365 account, using Azure Active Directory accounts. Specifically, I want to use my Azure AD account to log into our Office 365 account and access account properties, contacts, calendar, etc. Currently, I'm logged into my Office 365 account as a Windows Live ID, and then when I want to use Azure AD to access my O365 account, I have to use a Azure AD account with the same Windows
