A: It's quite simple. You need to patch Steam's de-compilation process with some decryption key. When steam is running try to copy /usr/bin/steamcmd to a pendrive When game installed start Steam and patch value of "[Client] DllCheckLocation" with your copy of Steamcmd Hint: If you are using steam in latest version you should try the SteamApps-root-dir value to make Steam recognize the folder. If you use a custom game dir. skip the steamapps-root-dir and use the game dir instead. In such cases try the steamapps-user-dir and also try the steamapps-user-home-dir and steamapps-user-desktop-dir. Sidenote: I'm answering your question here, because in the comment section you are asking for a "decrypted steamcmd" but by patching Steam's internal files you are getting a "decrypted steamcmd" for free. Q: How do I kill a bad edit after I have submitted it? My biggest concern is: For example if I edit a question (ex: add a screenshot) and the problem is that the quote was wrong because of an error in the document, how do I save my edit if I discover my mistake? What is the best way to correct it? I want that when the edit gets approved the problem is solved. Note that the case I'm talking about is that I have a screenshot in the question, so I can't ask a new question for the same problem or something like that. A: Look at the Last-Modified in the Revision History. Click on that to see what version was last edited. Then check for yourself to see if that version is the one that you want to keep. If you have any doubt, you can always rollback. If you can't edit, you can always suggest an edit. In your case, it would be to post a new question. It's okay to have two questions that are basically the same in general (technically, the new one should be better, but sometimes it's just easier to rephrase). Q: R Time series: Adjusting predictors with log-transform when omitting observations I am trying to perform a regression in R to model the prices of securities over time. My data has, e.g., daily prices
